[On is often translated into English by the passive form of the verb (V. Ex. 1). This is sometimes elegant. On after such words as et, on, est, qui, que, où, et, etc., that would form with it a passive or produce any other dissimilarity, frequently becomes for euphony l'on (V. Ex. 1); unless the on is immediately followed by le, la, les, lui, or other words beginning with l' (V. Ex. 1). In interrogations, where it would follow a verb ending in a or s, a, t, preceded and followed by a hyphen (—), is placed between them for the sake of euphony (V. Ex. 1).]

N'ait pas —! n'ayez pas —! I never fear; I don't be alarmed; n'ait pas n'ayez pas — pour q. u. I never fear (a. o.).

Syn. — PEUR, FRAYEUR, TERREUR. These three terms indicate, with different degrees of intensity, the state of a mind more or less troubled by the sight of danger. When this danger is sudden in its appearance, it produces peur (fear); if it is more imminent, and allows us time to perceive its full extent, it causes frayeur (dread); when it is so strong as to depress our minds and deprive of the power of considering the means of escape, it is said to inspire terreur (terror).

[PLAIN in the 3d, 5th, and 6th senses precedes the noun.]

PLEIN [plin] prep. full (of).

Avoir du vin — en cave, to have o.'s cellar full of wine; avoir ses poches d'argent, to have o.'s pockets full of money.

Syn. — PLEIN, REMPLI. Plein has reference to the capacity of an object; rempli, to the quantity that is to be put in that capacity. What is plein (full) will hold no more; that is rempli (filled) may have room for more, but as it has received the proper amount, this room must remain unoccupied. At the marriage in Canaan, the vessels were remplies (filled) with water, but by a miracle became pleines (full) of wine.

[Plus preceding a n. takes d (V. Ex. 1). Plus, comparative, attended with the term que, preceding an inf., requires that the prep. governed by the adj. should be repeated (V. Ex. 1). If the verb is not in the inf. it takes n before it (V. Ex. 1). When the prep. is also the art, it is invariable (V. Ex. 2). When Plus precedes a number, it is followed by de to express than (V. Ex. 3).]

Plus — Plus, DAVANTAGE. Plus implies a direct comparison; it is followed by que (than) introducing a second term. Davantage is never used unless the second term is brought in before it, and consequently no que is necessary. We would say, Rome was plus (more) powerful que (than) Carthage; or, Carthage was powerful, but Rome dépassait davantage (was more so).

POISON [poa-zôn] n. m. | § (pour, to) poison.

— mortel, deadly =. Avec l'effet du —, poisonously. Prendre du —, to take =.

Syn.—Poison, venin. Pois-n is used to denote that which contains venin; venin is the poisonous principle itself. The deadly effects of every pois-n are owing to the venin which it contains.

Another distinction observed in the use of these terms is that pois-n is generally applied to vegetable productions, while venin is specially applicable to venomous animals. We speak of the pois-n (poison) of plants, but the venin (venom) of the viper.

We prize (beg) our equals and friends to render us a service; we supplicate (prayer) the king to accord us a favor.

Syn. - PRIER DE DÎNER, PRIER À DÎNER, INVITER À DÎNER. I prie de dîner (ask to dinner) a friend who happens to be at my house at the time that meal is ready. If I invite him for a special occasion, and make unusual preparations on his account, the expression prier à dîner is appropriate. Inviter à dîner implies greater formality, and is used when an invitation is extended to persons of consequence, or guests for whose entertainment preparations of some magnitude are made.

Syn. — SÉRIEMENT, JUREMENT, JURON. The serment is employed to render a promise more solemn and binding; the jurement serves to confirm the truth of testimony; the juron is an expletive used in conversation to strengthen one's assertions. The serment (oath) of a prince cannot bind him to any act that violates the laws or is contrary to the interests of the state. The most solemn serment (oath) does not make the habitual liar more worthy of belief. The frequent use of jurons (oaths) betokens one who is as low as he is wicked.

Syn. — SÉRIEMENT, VOEU. The serment (oath) is a solemn declaration by which we invoke the vengeance of God if we fail to fulfil a promise; the voeu (vow) is an engagement entered into voluntarily to the Deity himself, by which we impose on ourselves an obligation to do certain things to which we would not otherwise have been bound. Joshua kept his serment (oath) to the Gibeonites notwithstanding the deceit by means of which it was obtained. Jephtha, when it was too late, lamented his fatal voeu (vow).

Syn.—SONGE, RÊVE. Songe, in its literal sense implies a state of slumber; rêve is not thus limited, but is equally applicable to what are called in English day-dreams. The waking man has rêves, not songes. We speak of the rêves of delirium, of poetical rêves, in which cases songes could not properly be employed.

When rêve is used, like songe, to denote thought or series of thoughts of a person in sleep, it implies vagueness, wildness, incoherence, the absence of all probability and reason; songe, on the other hand, is characterized by vividness, so natural a connection between parts, and such an appearance of reality, that makes a deep impression on the mind. So in the figurative significations, we say of what is ridiculous or unlikely that it is a rêve; we call a songe that is merely transient, vain, or illusory, a songe.

Syn. — TEL, PARFEL, SEMBLABLE. Of these terms of comparison, the first is stronger than the second, and the second than the third. Tel implies perfect conformity in the objects compared; parfel expresses such a close resemblance between them, that, though differing in minor points, they may be used indiscriminately; semblable denotes that, while quite distinct in nature and character, there still exists such a general likeness or analogy, that the mind involuntarily connects them together.

Achilles, tel que a lion, has all the fury and distinctive characteristics of that animal; parfel a lion, he has the same degree of fierceness; semblable a lion, he imitates its ferocity, and so successively that the idea of a lion suggests itself to all that behold him.
